By Matthew RatzI finished reading Trina Selstad's job search manual over the weekend, and I wanted to be the first to comment on it on .com. I found the job search advice Ms. Selstad delivers in her book to be quite good and relevant to our modern times. Her ethos as an HR professional for over a decade supports this strong advice. She includes appendices with links to different job boards and websites, and her book also contains several strong cover letter and thank you letter samples as well as many resume templates one can use to create his own winning resume. My one area of criticism, however, is the lack of scripture in this book. I was truly hoping for a text that delved deeply into the Bible to pull out relevant job search advice and scriptural encouragement. Instead, Ms. Selstad used biblical quotations along with quotations from several commentators and missionaries to begin her chapters. While these epigraphs did help to set up, in my mind, the idea that this advice was coming from a biblical direction, I would have appreciated more direct biblical quotation and the scholarship connecting those insights to a job seeker's predicament. All in all, I would say that The Bible Believers Job Search Handbook is a good starting point for the religious job seeker, and it makes a nice addition to a job seeker's library, but the author could have strengthened her Bible scholarship to deliver a truly unique work on the Bible and the Job Search.
