anyone considering a job change or for anyone seeking a first job. Ms. Flaherty, who has an impressive background in the human resources arena, takes the reader into the minds of those persons whose job it is to hire employees for various types of positions in a variety of employment situations. The text, written in a common sense and easily-grasped fashion, illustrates how the job seeker has more control over the interview process than he or she may think. Ms. Flaherty provides suggestions about pre-interview preparation, sample interview questions, and shows the reader why one or more particular sample responses are preferable to others. The reader comes to understand why an employer would select one potential employee over another and is better prepared to become the candidate who gets the job offer rather than the one receiving the rejection email. Anyone still in the job market should take a look at this little book. It is more than worth the price!

This is an excellent book to read before you interview for the job you really want. It is a simple and straight forward guide for preparing for questions you will be asked and tips for answering them. It also gives you a window into the mind of the interviewer and how he/she processes your interview answers. A great graduation gift!

You've filled out the application and provided a professional resume. Now you've finally received the phone call you've been waiting for. You're scheduled for an interview at that company where you've been hoping to get your next job. So now what? For many of us, this is the most anxiety-provoking part of the job-hunting process. It can seem like interviewers are determined to trip you up, asking trick questions designed to catch you unprepared. But in actuality, good interviewers are just looking for a specific set of traits that can be broken down into three Cs: Character, Competence, and your Chemistry or compatibility with the company's people and culture. Throughout her forty-year career, author Patricia A. Flaherty has worked in senior HR leadership roles for some of the biggest companies in the world. Now, in The Interview Answer, she provides a straightforward, user-friendly guide to coming up with the right answers and questions to make your best qualities shine. Featuring ten valuable tips for interviewing well, with plenty of example questions and answers, this essential guide for jobseekers everywhere will let you know exactly what potential employers are looking and listening for, so you can ace that next interview.

About the Author Having held a number of senior leadership positions in her forty-year professional and corporate career, Patricia A. Flaherty knows what it takes to land the job of your dreams. Most recently, she retired from the Ford Motor Company, where she held dual roles as the global Director of Ford Learning and Development and Ford HR Strategy. In her time at Ford, she was responsible for leading professional development efforts for all Ford employees, from new hires to senior executives, and she helped formulate the behaviors that Ford candidates are assessed against during the interview process. Post-retirement, Flaherty served as a consultant for the development of Ford's best-in-class talent acquisition strategy. Flaherty is the president of PF Enterprises, LLC. A married mother of three grown children, she currently provides consulting, speaking, coaching, training, and volunteer services for a number of for-profit and not-for-profit organizations.
